

MA Social Policy

Programme Overview

Interested in social change? Students on our programme explore the politics and economics of welfare capitalism in order to re-imagine how we live and interact with society.

Our engaging modules examine the ideologies and political-economic projects that underpin different stages of welfare development, and possible future changes for the welfare state. In particular, the course examines how social policies can reinforce and reproduce marginalisation and oppression in society for women, deprived communities, ethnic minorities, migrants, disabled people and older people.

Not only do we encourage students to understand policies in a global context, we also provide research training which covers the key philosophical issues and traditions in social science and the uses and strengths of the range of methods and methodological approaches. Finally, the programme enables participants to develop a range of dialogical and transferable skills, which will maximise their potential for employment and equip them with the knowledge and awareness of changing global social dynamics, necessary in order to pursue leading and managerial positions in various fields, including education, business, media and governance.

Curriculum

The programme consists of four modules and a dissertation (final research project) totalling 180 credits. Assessment methods will vary and may include academic essays, reports, presentations and examinations, research proposals and a research dissertation.

- Advanced Social Theory (30 credits): You will engage with, evaluate and critically analyse a range of classical and contemporary social theory, with a focus on theoretical explanations of social change in the areas of economic relations, political ideologies, and patterns of political domination.
- Advanced Research for Social Change (30 credits): This module adopts an innovative pedagogical approach, which combines a study of research philosophies with practical exercises, thereby providing insights into strategies and experiences acquired by social scientists at Liverpool Hope. On this course, you will learn about a diverse range of innovative research techniques and become equipped with the skills to design a high-quality research dissertation.
- Transformations in the UK welfare state (30 credits): This part of the course explores the key issues in social policy in the UK from historical and contemporary perspectives. We investigate the relationship between social policies and the wider political economy, unpicking and critically analysing recent changes such as privatisation, marketization and austerity. The course is grounded in applying theoretical perspectives such as Marxist, feminist, and postcolonial approaches to empirical evidence. It analyses changes in the welfare state in relation to politics, economics and social inequalities in class, race and gender.
- Global Social Policy (30 credits): This part of the course broadens the scope to situate, both theoretically and historically, some of the major global social issues that the world faces in the early 21st century. The focus is on how global social problems manifest in policy choices, and impact on the welfare and wellbeing of different groups in society on a global scale. The module takes in the colonial roots of modern processes of globalisation and examines different accounts of the nature of global inequality. It examines the role of International Organisations in setting global social and economic policies in order to understand the new forms of global social and economic development, exploitation, inequality and injustice. A succession of global social problems are also explored; including climate breakdown, work and exploitation, migration and bordering, social reproduction, global public health inequalities, and the responses of social justice movements to these tendencies.

- Dissertation/Research Project (60 credits): The focus of the research project will be on an issue of relevance to the study of social policy. The study can involve the collection of primary data or a literature-based dissertation.
